

The Past and Future of Dual Citizenship: Citizenship and Migration in the 21st Century

Dual citizenship, the legal status of being a citizen of two countries at the same time, has become increasingly common in the 21st century. While dual citizenship was once a relatively rare occurrence, it is now estimated that there are over 100 million dual citizens around the world. This trend is likely to continue in the future, as increasing globalization and international mobility make it easier for people to acquire citizenship in multiple countries.

Historical Background

The concept of dual citizenship is not new. In fact, dual citizenship was common in the ancient world, when many people lived in empires that spanned multiple countries. However, the rise of the nation-state in the 19th century led to a decrease in dual citizenship, as most countries began to require their citizens to choose one nationality.
