The Discovery of the Letter

The letter was discovered by a French police officer named Jean-Jacques Fouquier-Tinville, who was responsible for investigating the royal family's correspondence during the Revolution. The letter was found in the possession of the Comte de Mercy-Argenteau, the Austrian ambassador to France. It was addressed to "My Angel" and signed "Marie Antoinette de France." The letter was written in a code that was unknown to the authorities at the time.

The Cipher Key

Accompanying the letter was a cipher key, which was written on the side of the page. The key consisted of 128 characters, each representing a different letter or symbol. The key was used to encode the letter's contents, making it impossible for unauthorized individuals to read it without knowing the key.

Historical Context

The letter was written during a period of great turmoil in France. The Revolution had begun in 1789, and the monarchy was under threat. Marie Antoinette and her husband, King Louis XVI, were imprisoned in the Tuileries Palace. Count von Fersen, who was a close friend of the queen, had fled France but remained in communication with her.

The Enigma of the Letter

The contents of the letter have been the subject of much speculation. Some historians believe that it contains evidence of a love affair between Marie Antoinette and Count von Fersen. Others believe that it is simply a coded message that was used to communicate secret information about the political situation in France.

Attempts at Deciphering the Letter

Numerous attempts have been made to decipher the letter's contents. In 1817, a French cryptographer named Etienne Bazeris claimed to have cracked the code. However, his solution was later discredited. In 1891, another French cryptographer named Maurice Barrès claimed to have deciphered the letter, but his solution was also rejected by most experts.

In 1991, a team of German cryptographers led by Klaus Schmech claimed to have finally cracked the code. Schmech's team used a computer to analyze the letter's contents and the cipher key. They concluded that the letter contained a coded message from Marie Antoinette to Count von Fersen, in which she expressed her love for him and her fears for her family.

Controversy and Debate

Schmeh's solution has been controversial, and some experts have questioned its accuracy. Several other cryptographers have attempted to decipher the letter, but no consensus has been reached. The mystery of the French Angel Letter 14 remains unsolved.
