

Your Guide to Electing Our First Woman President

For over 240 years, the United States has been led by men. But in 2020, that could change. With a record number of women running for president, it is more likely than ever that we will finally elect our first woman president.

But electing a woman president will not be easy. There are still many barriers that women face in politics, and the road to the White House is long and difficult. But it is a road that is worth traveling, and it is a road that we can travel together.

The Barriers that Women Face in Politics

Women face a number of barriers in politics, including:

- Sexism: Women are often subjected to sexism and misogyny, both from their opponents and from the media. This can make it difficult for women to be taken seriously as candidates.
- Lack of funding: Women often have a harder time raising money than men, which can make it difficult to run a competitive campaign.
- Lack of support: Women often lack the support of the political establishment, which can make it difficult to get their message out to voters.

The Road to the White House

The road to the White House is long and difficult, but it is a road that women can travel. Here are a few things that we can do to help elect our first woman president:

- Support women candidates: Donate to their campaigns, volunteer your time, and spread the word about their candidacies.

- Challenge sexism and misogyny: Speak out against sexism and misogyny when you see it, and support organizations that are working to end gender discrimination.
- Get involved in politics: Run for office yourself, work on campaigns, or volunteer for organizations that are working to make a difference in the political process.

Electing a woman president will not be easy, but it is a goal that is worth striving for. By working together, we can break down the barriers that women face in politics and pave the way for our first woman president.
